A shudder of horror followed the announcement that Isaac Higgins, one of Petersburg's best known citizens, had met with a horrible death at the fair grounds. With thousands of other citizens he had gone to the fair grounds to attend the Labor Day celebration. Shortly after arriving there, accompanied by William Finney and Lawrence Hornbrook, local citizens, started across the track; the time being about half-past one o'clook.

Among the events of the day celebration, and probably the one drawing more people to the ground than any other, was the automobile race, which by the way, was given by the Petersburg Racing Associa tion, on account of the race having been postponed on account of heavy the races of August 1-6. Several of the cars were on the track getting ready for the race when the three-gentlemen, named above, started across, Finney and Hornbrook safely doing so.
