LABOR DAY CELEBRATION

Today, Monday, Sept. 7th, Princeton is host to the Labor Day celebration for the southwestern section of Indiana and if the visitors maintain their usual numbers many thousand people will be here from this part of the state to take part in the parade and the celebration which will follow at the Gibson County fair grounds.

A program in the afternoon will consist of musical numbers, speeches and presentation of leaders in the labor movement.

The Gibson County fair grounds has been deemed the most desirable place in this section of Indiana to hold the annual Labor Day meet and, as a result of this Princeton has experienced little competition from other cities in securing the votes of the representatives when it comes to choosing the place.

Nothing is left undone by Princeton people and mainly, by the several unions which have headquarters in Gibson county, to make the event one of enjoyment to all the visitors. The grounds furnish ample room for automobile parking, plenty of good water, shade and the grandstand gives those in attendance a place to rest.

Naturally, a celebration of this character calls for considerable labor on the part of many people and those who perform these duties each year really do not have the pleasure of a "day off."

It is the hope of all that our thousands of visitors will have a fine time, enjoy themselves throughout the day and evening, come and go without the least difficulty, even minus a flat tire.

INDIANA'S RATING ON ILLITERACY

With 43,721 above 10 years of age unable to read and write, Indiana ranks thirteenth among the forty-eight states and the District of Columbia in having least illiteracy. During the past decade illiteracy dropped from 52,034 until now 1.7 per cent of the population can not read and write.

Indiana's illiteracy, though not as large as that in some states, still constitutes a serious problem for her public-spirited citizens to tackle. When it is realized that there are 22,510 native white illiterate in Indiana, more than the number of native white illiterates in the state of Mississippi, at once it appears that 50 per cent of the problem deals with persons indigenous to the soil.

There are now in the state 13,536 foreign-born white illiterates, 5,605 Negro illiterates and 2,070 constituting other races.

The state has lined up with forty-two other states and the District of Columbia in the creation of a state advisory committee on illiteracy in order to give special attention to this one education problem. Since the 1930 census figures are now in, the committee is in a position to bring about a closer co-operation with the county superintendents of education on whom so much responsibility rests in placing this state higher in rank than she now finds herself. Since the problem is essentially a local problem, a co-ordination of activities reaching to the individuals in the counties is the only sure way of eradicating illiteracy altogether.
